BUT WAIT...MAYBE "BALDY" NEEDS THE SYMPATHY!

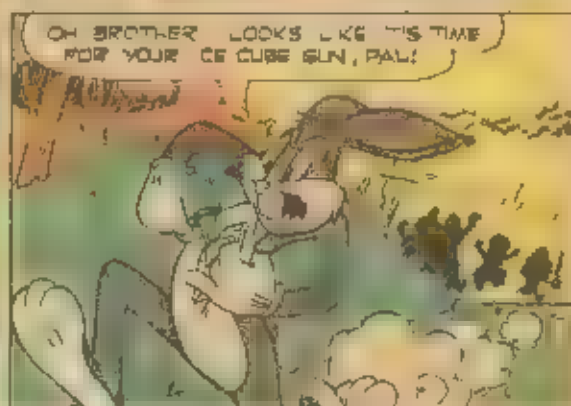

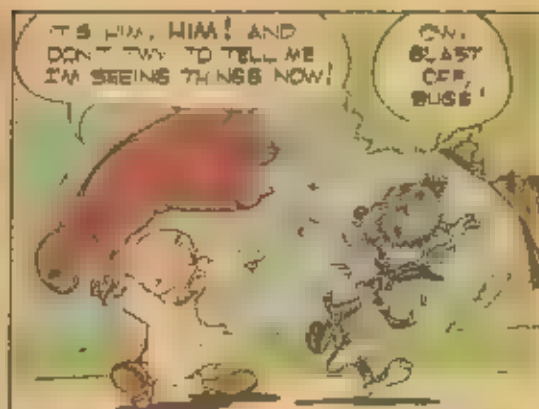

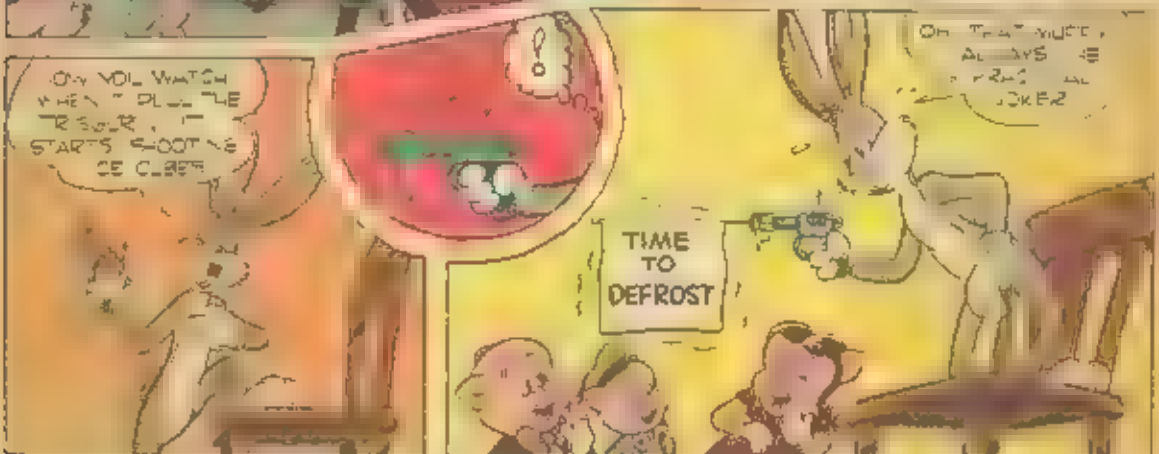

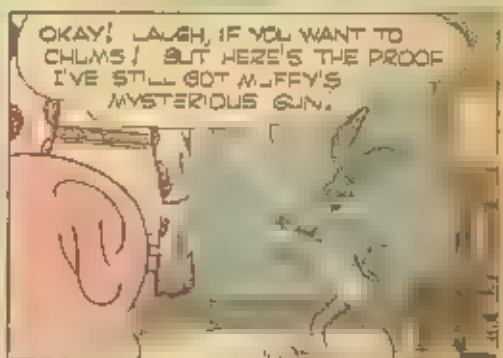

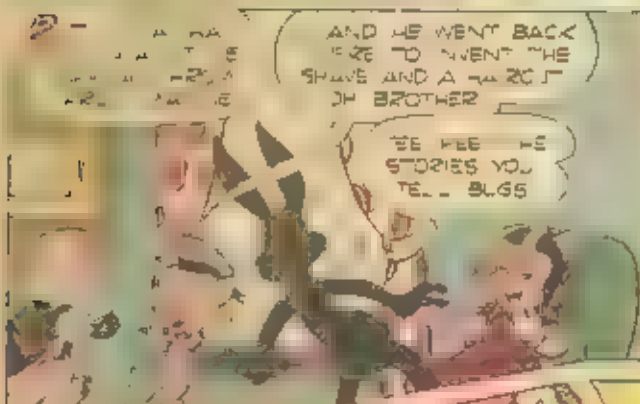

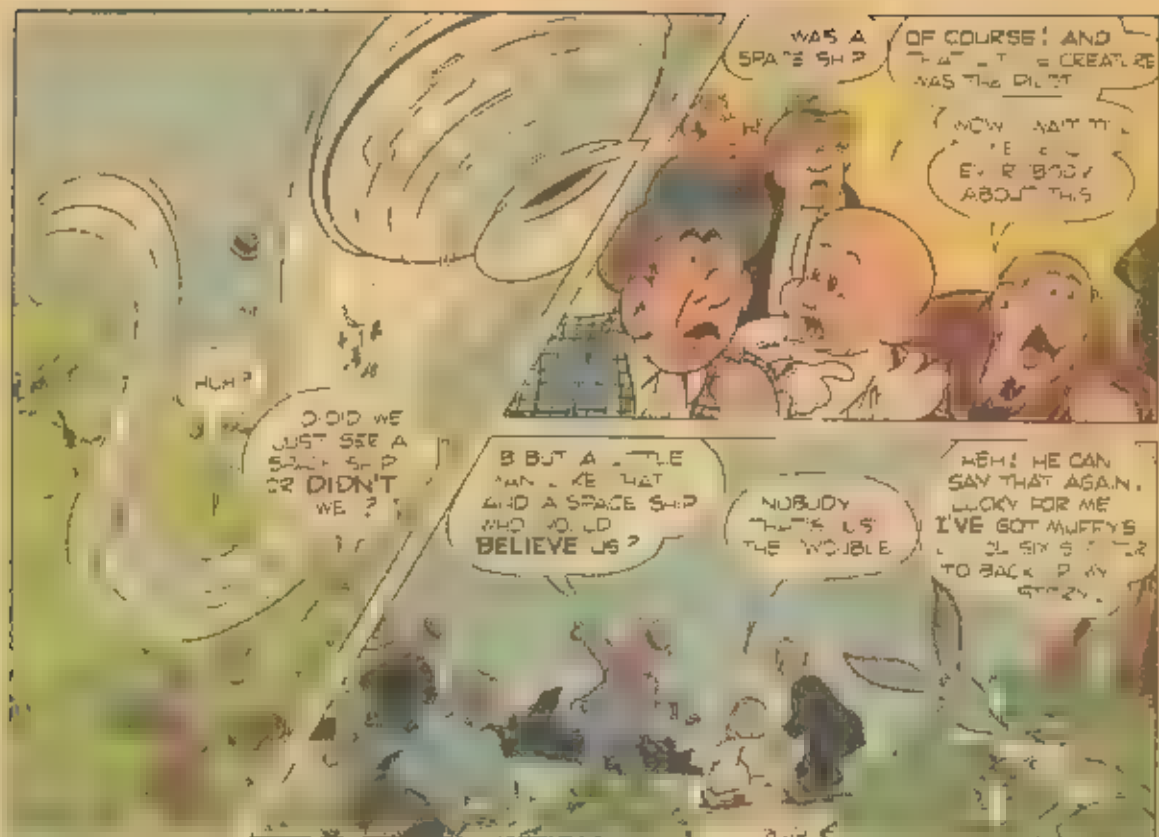

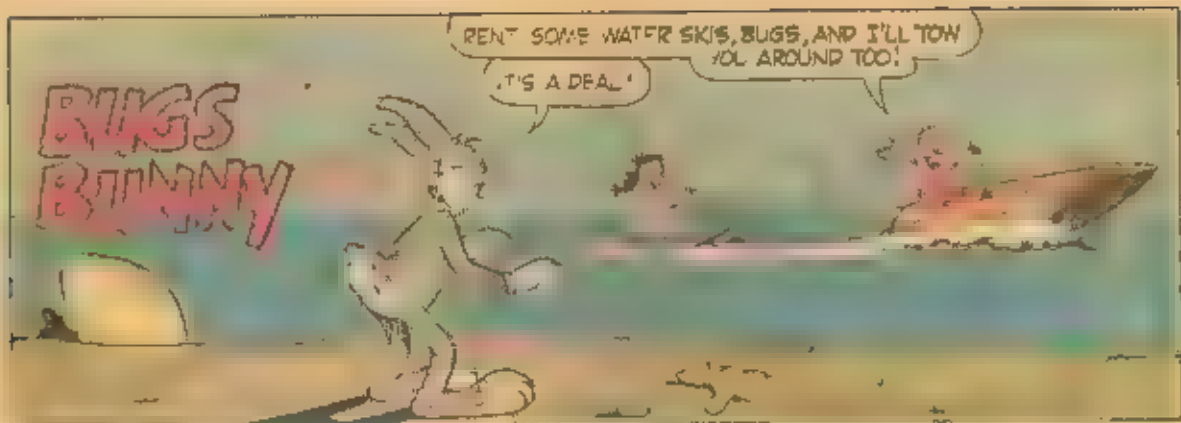

A DEFECTIVE DETECTIVE

"Can that be who I think it is?" Ollie Owl muttered to himself one day. "It looks like Henery Hawk, decked out in a detective hat, walking along holding a magnifying glass near the ground. Hey, Henery," he called, "what are you up to now?"

"Shhh!" Henery shushed. "Can't you see I'm working on a case?"

Henery handed Ollie a card which read "Henery Hawk, private hawkys. Investigations and detections while you wait."

"So that's why you're dressed up like one of those television detectives," Ollie hooted. "What kind of a case are you working on, and for who... I mean whom?"

"Stop who-whoming so loud!" Henery ordered. "You'll scare my quarry away."

"I don't see any quarry," Ollie said.

"Look," Henery offered, handing his huge magnifying glass to Ollie. "See those tracks on the ground? My quarry made them."

"Hmm," Ollie mumbled suspiciously. "Those look like ordinary hen tracks to me."

"That's right," Henery chuckled slyly. "As long as I'm in the detecting business, I thought I might as well be my own first client and track down a few hens."

"You're just letting yourself in for a lot of trouble," Ollie warned.

"Born oosh!" Henery scoffed.

"How do you know those are hen tracks and not some other kind?" Ollie asked.

"I guess I know hen tracks when I see them," Henery said indignantly. "Now, if you're going to play detective and tag along with me, you've got to be quiet."

"Okay, okay," Ollie whispered.

Henery stooped over the tracks, examining them through his magnifying glass. "The hen went this way," he announced, following the tracks down the path. "Ah, good. Our quarry seems to be headed for the woods away from Farmer Brown's hen yard."

Those sure are mighty big tracks for a hen," Ollie said doubtfully.

"So what?" Henery sneered. "All that means is that we're tracking a big hen."

Into the woods they followed the tracks. Then out of the woods they followed the tracks. "I'll be jiggered," Henery exclaimed with surprise. "They're headed right for my house. Here's where we started. Now they're circling back again. There are two sets of tracks here now besides our own."

Henery and Ollie followed the second set of tracks which were, strangely enough, headed in the same direction as the first.

"Look!" Ollie gasped with astonishment a few minutes later. "We're back to where we started from and now there are three sets of tracks, besides our own."

"You know, Ollie," Henery trembled, "it almost looks as if somebody is tracking us instead of the other way around."

"That's right," a voice behind them spoke abruptly. "I've been following you."

"Yikes! It's Foghorn Leghorn," Henery gasped upon seeing the huge rooster. "Let's get out of here!"

Foghorn chased Henery and Ollie down the path. "You stay away from my hens forever, that's final," he panted.

"You know, Ollie," Henery puffed when they were safely inside his home, "I think maybe I'll give up tracking hens for awhile."

"Do I detect a note of defeat in your voice?" Ollie asked with a chuckle. "It's just as well. Every time you try tracking those smart chucks, you end up making a dumb cluck of yourself!"
